Learn about the Photoshop interface in Chapter 5 and how to use the basic tools (e.g., the Color Picker and Brush tool) in Chapter 6. In this chapter, we explore Photoshop's tools for working with color and for using layers to build layers of color. We also touch on using filters to modify colors and add special effects. Understanding Color in Photoshop A color is something that a person sees. Even though color is invisible, a person sees color through the sense of sight. The colors we see in the rainbow are part of a spectrum called the spectrum of light.

Every color is part of that spectrum. Photoshop uses eight basic colors. In addition to the eight basic colors, Photoshop also supports the Photoshop Calibrated Color modes, which are a set of colors that produce different colors (or looks) and are calibrated for producing accurate color separation or halftone printing. Each color has a code number called a hexadecimal value, which is usually written in a hexadecimal format that includes the numerical value from 0 to F. The codes that represent the colors are usually preceded with the letters B or R in a form like RGB, BGR, or R11, G11, B11, for example. An RGB value of 15, 12, and 24 represents red, green, and blue, respectively. If you're new to Photoshop, check out the online video tutorials from Adobe at www.youtube.com/adobediphotoshop and play around with the Color Picker tool, which can change the Hex color code and RGB code. Color theory The term color theory refers to the study of how the mind sees color. Science has not agreed on one way in which the brain sees color. Scientists have come up with several different theories, such as the theory of simultaneous contrast, the theory of successive contrast, and the theory of color adaptation. Many scientists believe that color is processed in different ways in the brain than we think. Both the theory of simultaneous contrast and the theory of successive contrast assume that colors always appear as a mixture of two different shades that occur side by side, or in rapid succession. Both theories also assume that we respond to the dominant color and ignore the color in the fringe of the color area. But no other theory says that. Some other scientists believe that it's the fringe colors that attract our attention. Still others believe that color is processed in the brain in a way that is very
