Navy map of the worldThe map shows areas where global warming could alter the environmental conditions for human life and activities. Click on an area on the map to learn more about its potential impact. A new animated video, "The World of Tomorrow," hosted by, science adviser, James Fallows, and political cartoonist, Tom Toles, takes viewers around the world to examine issues connected with climate change. The video includes interviews with climate scientists, engineers, economists, and other experts on global warming. The animation is an effort to highlight the “multiplier effect” of climate change, in which every impact of warming affects far more than one thing. For example, researchers with the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration estimate that 2 degrees Celsius of global warming could result in trillions of dollars in lost economic productivity by 2080 in the U.S. economy alone. But there are other economic consequences that could be just as profound. Researchers with the National Center for Atmospheric Research note that the extreme weather associated with climate change could cost the U.S. $2.8 trillion in damages and losses annually by 2080 and that the growing temperatures in the Arctic, for example, may make the environment there unsuitable for some species. Other noted climate scientists
