YTBs Free NGINX Fix Portable Cracker (Worked on WINDOWS XP/Vista/7/8/8.1/10).Q: Using ClassLoader to gain an easy way to unload dependency classes and reinstall them In my project I need a setup that involves an existing server and a new server where I'm replacing some code that has a known bug in it. The idea of this "bug fix" is that I create some new dependency classes that depend on classes in the current server to "fix" the bug. I would then load those classes from a class loader that implements some 'flag' indicating that they were patched and then use those patched classes on the new server. However, in order to unload the existing classes (and allowing the new classes to be loaded) I would have to somehow write something to the server's JVM in such a way that it could determine whether or not those classes have already been loaded. I was wondering if there is a way that I can: 1) Dump out all classes from a dependency ClassLoader 2) Reload the classes from the dependency ClassLoader 3) Not reload the classes on which I've patched them Is there an easy way to do this? I've seen references to the ClassLoader.unload() method but it always seems to indicate that the class loader should be unloaded - not its dependencies. Thanks! A: If the classes you are loading are part of your codebase, you should not load them from a JDK class loader. You should rather load them from a custom class loader.

If you need to bypass loading classes that are part of your codebase, you should consider loading them with Class#forName with the fully qualified name of the class. This will resolve them as if they were loaded already, but this can break if the class 6d1f23a050
